Mark Langdon has over 30 years senior management and board experience in the engineering, construction and manufacturing sectors.

Mark has a proven record in improving business performance, revenue and profitability through leadership and entrepreneurship; training, developing and motivating staff; developing new business opportunities through innovation; and the formation of strategic alliances.

Mark constantly examines industry structures, dynamics and trends to identify business improvement and new market opportunities. His work approach demonstrates a high level of creativity with a capacity to think strategically and “outside the square”.

Mark is a Director of Clark Thomas & Scott, a business advisory consultancy that works with Directors and Business Owners wishing to improve their organisation’s performance. He is a founding director of an organisation, comprising senior executives from various industry sectors, which provides management expertise and funding assistance for start-up ventures. He is also an Associate of the Institute for Independent Business, an international accreditation body for senior business executives, which is headquartered in London.

Mark was a Director of the Australian Construction Industry Institute which undertook numerous projects to improve the performance and efficiency of the construction industry. He was also an industry representative for the CRC for Construction Innovation. Mark also co-founded the “Australian Housing Supply Chain Alliance” comprising representatives from major Australian building and supply companies, government and academia to develop an innovation model to identify and commercialise product and process improvements in the residential building sector.

Mark also facilitates a series of monthly public lectures titled “Learning From Entrepreneurs” for the Australian Graduate School of Entrepreneurship.
